

The Proof is in the Lighting..

Mardjokic.com

12/20/2011

A copy of this article is available in PDF format here.

I came across these photos of the Korean peninsula and African continent. Striking. Truly striking. I think there's a case to be made that economic development can be measured one light bulb at a time.

Nothing new I can add here. I think the author says it best:

Development means many things. Health, education, roads. But at the end of the day, the most visible symbol of development is where there is light, and where there is not.

When someone wants to show how communism retards development, they point to the famous image of the two Koreas: North Korea is dark, South Korea is bright.

Source: Afrikent

